Extracts from letter of Marie Louise Brent in Paris.] "Just back from a most exciting day at the office. We have been asked to help the Department of the Aisne. Ten thousand people from nearby towns were herded together in a town that in normal times contained four thousand. They were locked in cellars and hadn't been allowed out since the 1st of December. They were half starved and so covered with vermin that they had hardly tooked human. The wounded had had no care and their wounds were in a fearful condition. The Carrels took a lot of them at once to heir hospital at Campeigne, but the stench of these poor creatures was so awful that their seasoned infirmi-ties were all ill. They found that dead bodies had been systematically shut up with the children for five days in order to breed disease amongst them. There is no UNSPEAKABLE thing that was not done to them. We got busy at once and managed 100 bales and cases of warm clothing, blankets, rice, dried beans and peas and con-"I went down to see Madame Courcol at the cantine, and there I found children, sent back from the towns that have been retaken. Madame Courcol was feeding them and around the table passed a constant stream of their friends, hoping to find some of their own families, of whom they had not heard for nearly three years. Never has the war come home to me in all its horror as it did in that moment. There were about 500 people standing in line for their return to go down into the cantine. They were taken in groups of fifty at a time. I shall never forget the look in the faces of those awaiting their turn, the expression of mingled dread and hope. After two and a half years of suspense they were to know the truth. There were heart-rending scenes of reunion but also dreadful scenes of despair. One soldier going back to the trenches came to get news of his wife and was told that the Germans had carried her off. Imagine the rage, despair and fury in his heart. It is all too appalling. I couldn't help sobbing all the way home in the motor. How can these things be borne. I don't know how women bear the things they must. If they broke down it wouldn't be so bad. That quiet courage I cannot bear. They were all quiet at Madame Courcol's but the most intense feeling of which human beings are capable was concentrated in their faces. It is so dreadful to see suddenly all the terrible things I have suffered in my heart on the faces of hundreds of poor creaon the faces of hundreds of poor crea-ures. No one moaned or cried out or complained,—they all accepted what was told them with a quiet, infinitely

"I think what we will do will be to have a vestiare of women's and children's clothes at the station. Madame Courcol feeds them and we give them clothes. There are such pathetic little flocks of children all rigged up in anything that might serve to keep them warm. Some of the children look well, although the babies have been without milk,—survival of the fittest, I suppose. Only the strongest can get this far,—the rest have died on the way. It is already very well organized. They go directly from the arriving train to Madame Courcols, where they are fed and where the police take their narses. If they have relatives or friends they are sent to them; if not the Government sends them as boarders to poor people in Brittainy. Their homes with all they had, in every case, heve been destroyed, they have nothing. Even their money was all destroyed, for this paper of which I enclose you sample, and which the German made each 'commune' issue, so that they could take away all the French money. Of course, this paper is worthless, but some arrangement may be made by the Government to redeem it. In the meantime they have nothing. All they have in the world is a pipe of this paper, a bundle of any-nothing. All they have in the world is a pipe of this paper, a bundle of any-nothing. All they have in the world is a pipe of this paper, a bundle of any-nothing. All they have in the world is a pipe of this paper, a bundle of any-nothing. Madame Courcol came again today and told us of one village she had seen where the Germans told the population that the French were coming and as there would be a fight the woman and children were all to go to a 'designated part of the town' to be out of danger. When they had them all assembled, they turned machine guns on them and killed them all.
